VIDEO PROGRAM AT THE NEW MUSEUM EXPLORES GAY AND LESBIAN CONCERNS

"HOMO VIDEO: Where We Are Now," the first New York exhibition to be comprised exclusively of videotapes by gay men and lesbians, will be on view beginning at 1 p.m. every day (except Monday and Tuesday) December 12 through February 15, 1987 in the Workspace Gallery at The New Museum of Contemporary Art. The exhibition addresses contemporary issues relevant not only to the homosexual community but also to the general public and has been organized as an investigation of the specific ways in which gay men and lesbians are making art with a powerful social dimension.

AIDS dominates as a subject or leitmotif of many works—as a reality, as a factor in recent legal decisions regarding both gays and straights and as a social construction, described by curator William Olander as a fact that has been magnified by public attention into a social phenomenon.

Works created specifically for the art context and programs produced for network and cable television will be screened daily during Museum hours. Many of these tapes will be receiving a New York premiere during the exhibition. Tapes to be included, such as Peter Adair and Robert Epstein, The AIDS Show: Artists Involved with Death and Survival;
