

New Museum Announces Artists for Next Triennial, February's The Ungovernables

Abigail DeVille, What Happens to a Dream Deferred...Supernova, 2009.

This morning the New Museum released the names of the 34 artists and collectives who will participate in next year's The Ungovernables (February 15-April 22), the Lower East Side museum's follow-up to 2009's The Generational: Younger Than Jesus. As opposed to that show, which vetted many already-familiar art stars, The Ungovernables will mark many participants' New York debuts, as the exhibition focuses on artists from the Middle East, Latin America, Africa and Southeast Asia.

The artists included were all born between 1973 and 1984, and only four of them are based in New York. The roster of participants includes six artists' collectives hailing from India (CAMP), Indonesia (House of Natural Fiber), Nigeria (Invisible Borders), Vietnam (The Propeller Group) and Israel (Public Movement). Curator Eungie Joo explains that the exhibition's goal is to map the hopes of the generations that immediately followed the uprisings of the 60s and 70s. She writes:

In many ways this generation was formed by the instability of a period marked by military dictatorships, the IMF crises of the 1980s and 1990s, the spread of global capitalism and the rise of fundamentalism. [...] But what I encountered were artists whose practices demonstrate remarkable resiliency, pragmatism, flexibility, and hopefulness.

Here's the full list of those hopeful artists who'll be taking over every floor of the New Museum early next year:
